Habig started her transit career in 1992 as director of a very small county operated transit system in southeastern Ohio. After nine years, she ventured out of the transit community and into the for-profit transit world for ten years. Though she enjoyed many aspects of for-profit transportation organizations, she felt the need to go back to non-profit transit systems. “Even though there’s more struggles with non-profits; non-profits seem to care more about the service they provide.”

In 2014, Habig returned to Ohio and assumed the position as the Director of Seneca County Agency Transportation (SCAT). In 2017, SCAT expanded their service area to include Crawford County. The agency’s name is now: Seneca-Crawford Area Transportation (SCAT).

Habig is in her 30th year of transit management and smiles when she looks back and remembers all the great people she’s met through the years. “Seven states, hundreds of employees, thousands of tears, and millions of smiles because of transit,” said Habig. “Yep, I’d do it all over again!”
